

Neil Chambers

Neil Chambers is the CEO and Founder of Chambers Design, Inc, a design and consulting studio that focuses on green buildings, infrastructure, master planning and habitat restoration. He is a veteran of green design with more than 15 years experience. Called a "green design guru at the forefront of a new movement to make urban centers environmentally sustainable",

Chambers' accomplishments read like a "to-do" list to save the planet. He has served as an adjunct professor at New York University, teaching green design and environmental policy, and is a national fellow with the Environmental Leadership Program. He was instrumental in developing a Sustainable Design Entrepreneur certificate program at the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York City.

Chambers has a growing media presence, both in traditional media and the blogosphere, where his blogs for treehugger.com, which is owned by Discovery, has an active following of 8 million readers where he writes about design, architecture, fashion and infrastructure. He has also been featured in Architectural Record, The Sun News, BBC News, NY1, and Guernica Magazine.